Science tells us that the ability to adapt to change is essential for survival, even as we humans resist change at every turn. From its earliest days, The Peregrine Fund has deliberately managed to stay small, nimble, and flexible. I credit that adaptability for our success—and 2014 promises a lot more of both.

Among the most heart-breaking transitions in the past year was the loss of two good friends and board members. Frank Bond, a Peregrine Fund founder and our legal counsel, provided invaluable advice and unwavering support for more than 40 years. We also lost Velma Morrison, a Boise philanthropist who enabled us to open the visitor center that bears her name. Their long and faithful commitment to raptor conservation will be greatly missed.

The most sweeping transition is already underway in our recovery program for the Aplomado Falcon, an endangered species that occupied the American Southwest until the 1950s. For a quarter century, we worked to restore this beautiful raptor through captive breeding and releases to the wild. As a result, a small but self-sustaining population is now thriving along the Gulf Coast of Texas. We have ended captive breeding and releases and, to ensure the future well-being of these birds, shifted our focus to restoring the wide-open grasslands habitat the birds need to survive. This brings us a step closer to seeing this falcon removed from the U.S. Endangered Species List. We have honed our breeding and release skills over 43 years and they remain a valuable strategy for restoring California Condors and Orange-breasted Falcons.

“In the long history of humankind (and animal kind, too) those who learned to collaborate and improvise most effectively have prevailed.”

—Charles Darwin

As I look ahead, I see our work through a lens that increasingly encompasses not just specific species but landscapes and ecosystems. Twenty-five years ago, we began taking a big-picture approach in Madagascar, where we have helped protect large swaths of habitat for birds of prey and all the plants and animals they need to survive, including the people who coexist with them. Our newest project, which will examine the effects of climate change in the Arctic and its effects on the Gyrfalcon, adopts a similar landscape approach to solving exceedingly complex challenges.

We adapt to new challenges with innovative problem-solving. We are human, so the transition is not easy, but I am confident that we are facing the future head-on, thanks to donors and supporters who inspire us daily with their loyalty, passion, and generosity.

California Condor

In 2013, the Arizona-Utah flock produced four chicks in the wild—a record number—in and near the Grand Canyon. Three of the chicks fledged and grew under the watchful care of their parents. One chick went missing along with one of its parents; neither has been found or recovered.

This breeding activity in the wild is a promising sign that California Condors can survive on their own, but lead poisoning remains a significant hurdle. Our research shows that half of all condors that die are known to have died from exposure to lead. We monitor the flock closely to find and treat condors with lead poisoning and work closely with state authorities to encourage the voluntary use of non-lead ammunition by hunters to reduce condors' exposure to lead.

Aplomado Falcon

2013 was a transitional year for this recovery project, which began in 1986. The last chicks produced by our breeding facility were released to the wild along the Gulf Coast in South Texas, where a self-sustaining population exists. This brings us another step closer to the end of this project whose final chapter will be the falcon's removal from the U.S. Endangered Species List.

We are monitoring the Texas population while shifting emphasis to habitat improvements to ensure long-term success. Working with state and federal partners, we are focused on efforts to remove brush that has encroached on the once-wide-open landscape needed by Aplomado Falcons and other grassland species.

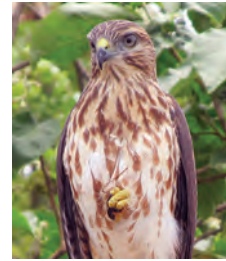

Asian vultures

Our research has indicated a positive trend—it appears that the ban on veterinary diclofenac in South Asia is having a positive effect on vulture populations, which were decimated when the drug was introduced in the 1990s. In 2003, The Peregrine Fund discovered the cause of the vulture die-off and the use of diclofenac to treat ailing cattle and livestock was subsequently banned in India, Pakistan, Nepal, and Bangladesh.

Now, 10 years later, our survey data shows that critically endangered Long-billed Vultures in Pakistan and India may be starting to recover, providing hope that the long effort to reverse their slide to extinction may be producing results. Vultures play a vital role in South Asia, making their recovery important for the health and culture of this region.

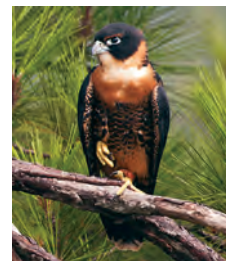

Ridgway's Hawk

Our innovative “assisted dispersal” project in Dominican Republic, which moves chicks from nests where survival is unlikely to more protected areas, proved in 2013 to be an effective way to enlarge a species' breeding range and reduce the risk of extinction. Two adults that had been relocated as chicks have now formed a pair and produced a chick, the first hatched outside the small, poorly protected national park where the remaining birds live.

Public education is a key component of this recovery project and we are taking steps to reduce human persecution of this critically endangered species.

Orange-breasted Falcon

Despite challenges from parasites and predators, 2013 was a good year for the rare Orange-breasted Falcon, a species we are breeding in captivity and releasing to the wild in Central America. Two captive-bred males released in 2010 mated with wild females and fledged five chicks, which were among a record high number of fledglings in our survey area in Belize and Guatemala.

In 2007, we began introducing a small number of captive-bred falcons to enhance genetic diversity and help mitigate population declines. Each year, we collect valuable information that will provide answers to complex challenges of habitat, survival, and shooting.

African Vulture Telemetry Study

Scientific research: the foundation of all our conservation strategies.

Wind energy

A research project on behalf of a wind energy development in Idaho caused us to begin in 2012 to assess what role we might play in measuring and mitigating the impact of wind farms on bird of prey populations. We also are assessing the effects of wind turbines on the breeding population of Golden Eagles near Altamont Pass, California.

Oil-spill monitoring

After the 2010 Deepwater Horizon Oil Spill in the Gulf of Mexico, The Peregrine Fund partnered with Earthspan to determine exposure rates in Peregrine Falcons migrating over and along the Gulf. We capture falcons along the Texas coast in the spring and fall and collect blood samples to be analyzed and measured for pre- and post-spill concentrations of a group of petroleum residues known as polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons (PAH).

Genetics

Using feathers and other samples collected by researchers in the field, the genetics of several species, including vultures, falcons, and owls, were studied to determine relationships and evolutionary histories. We use this molecular genetic data to inform our strategies to conserve the world's raptor biodiversity.

Scientific publications

Almost 20 scientific publications by Peregrine Fund researchers in 2013 covered topics ranging from Yellow-billed Kite ecology in Madagascar to Aplomado Falcon restoration in the United States.

We co-authored a paper published in 2014 based on several years of study of vultures in Africa. Using data collected from telemetry devices attached to three species of vultures in the Mara-Serengeti ecosystem, results dispelled a previous assumption that vultures followed large, concentrated migrations of animals such as wildebeest, when in fact they seek food where there is low rainfall and high prey mortality. The vultures travel over vast distances, highlighting the need to extend protection beyond the boundaries of national parks and reserves.

Telemetry studies in Africa revealed new information (opposite page) about vultures' extensive seasonal travels, reaffirming the need for conservation measures. To obtain the data, researchers (bottom left) attach a transmitter to a Rüppell's Vulture (center and bottom right). Lappet-faced (top) and African White-backed Vultures were included in the study.

Connecting professional and citizen scientists addresses problems before they become crises.

Tundra Conservation Network

Our newest professional network brings together leading scientists representing the eight nations of the Arctic. The purpose is to understand the complexities of the arctic landscape and formulate conservation strategies for this fragile ecosystem, from soil microbes to top predators like the Gyrfalcon. We hosted the network's inaugural meeting in February 2014.

American Kestrel Partnership

Professional researchers and citizen scientists are teamed up to better understand why populations of the American Kestrel are in decline in many areas, particularly along the East Coast of the United States. The kestrel is not yet endangered, raising the possibility that steps could be taken before the situation worsens. Citizen scientists observe nest boxes and enter data on our website; researchers analyze the data to establish trends and arrive at solutions.

Neotropical Raptor Network

This network links scientists, conservationists, and naturalists working on issues related to birds of prey in Central America, South America, and the Caribbean. In 2013, we co-hosted the first Worldwide Raptor Conference in Argentina with the Raptor Research Foundation. We also produced and distributed an e-newsletter to 383 subscribers and maintained the network's website.

Library and Global Raptor Information Network

Our ever-growing library is a vital resource to biologists and researchers all over the world. With nearly 25,000 titles in our catalogue, we were able in 2013 to supply free copies of 860 articles from the library and reprint collections in response to more than 300 requests, some of them from professionals and students who work in poor, undeveloped, or isolated regions. Biologists also communicate and keep up-to-date on new information through our online resource, the Global Raptor Information Network.

Education builds public awareness and support, creating a new generation of conservationists.

Through the Maasai Mentors Conservation Project, adults in the Maasai community (above) share their education and skills with schoolchildren so that they can be inspired to help end the deliberate poisoning of large predators, like lions and cheetahs, and the inadvertent secondary poisoning of vultures. The Peregrine Fund assists this project by supporting the education of adult mentors passionate about vulture research, biology, and conservation. Several Maasai mentors have earned or are pursuing advanced degrees from American and African universities.

Student Education

Our goal is to make a lasting contribution to conservation and science by training a raptor biologist in every nation in the world. We train and support promising individuals in their native countries who are as passionate and committed as we are in making raptor conservation their life's work. In 2013, The Peregrine Fund provided financial and logistical support to 22 students; we are very proud of our 2013 graduates from Peru and Madagascar who completed doctorate and master's degrees.

Velma Morrison Interpretive Center

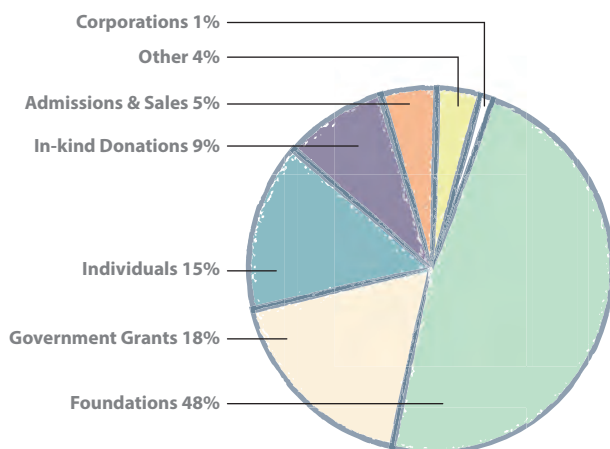

Nearly 30,000 visitors experienced our conservation message in 2013 at the visitor center, the public face of The Peregrine Fund. The visitor center hosts several special events throughout the year, the biggest being the outdoor flight demonstrations in the fall when enthusiastic crowds watch our education birds fly and soar. Educators, using traditional falconry techniques, highlight each bird's unique characteristics and skills. More than 6,800 students toured the visitor center or took part in presentations at their schools.

Archives of Falconry

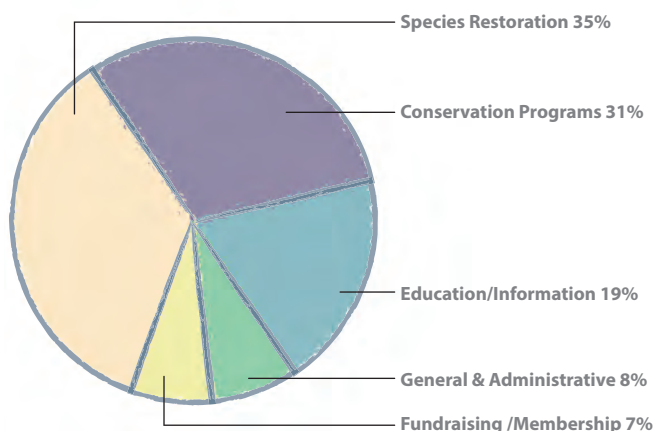

An astounding collection of books, artwork, and artifacts makes this archive unlike any other in the world. Twice-a-day tours allow visitors to learn about the ancient sport of falconry and the role that falconers play in raptor conservation. In the spring, the annual rendezvous attracted 125 falconers for a day to celebrate their sport, honor those who passed away, and enjoy a special exhibit of drawings and paintings by John Perry Baumlín.

Major donors include: 1) Bill and Barbara Belknap; 2) Idaho Women's Charitable Foundation; 3) Bureau of Land Management; 4) Sheikh Zayed bin Sultan Al Nahyan; 5) Gerald D. and Kathryn S. Herrick; 6) Velma Morrison; 7) Peter and Conni Pfindler.

thank you

Little things do count.

They count on you.

Last year, 28 California Condors had life-saving treatment for lead poisoning 55 Aplomado Falcon chicks hatched for our final releases in Texas webcam viewers logged 135,000 visits in one month to see Peregrines nesting researchers around the globe received 860 publications from our library and 6,617 students toured our visitor center free of charge.

Thank you for investing in conservation.
